They had had to spend money on the new schools, and how the institution was to find funds to maintain the number of children they used to educate he could not say. He trusted Christs Hospital would continue to flourish and to do as good work in the future as it had done in the past. Since they last met the old school had been turned out. This, in his opinion, was not necessary. During twenty-five years they had educated 12, 000 boys, and they had only lost twelve boys, which was at the rate of about half a boy a year. (Laughter.) The alterations had necessitated the expenditure of a large sum of money. Happily they were back again now, and he hoped it would be many years before they had to go through a similar experience. When they left the old place to go into the country he trusted they would continue to do a good work, although it was very manifest to him that the school under the new regime would be very different from what it had been in the past. Alluding to the litigation that had taken place between the governors and the Charity Commissioners, the speaker said they had been occupied of late in considering a plan for the use of the sacred endowments in dispute, and, although he was not at liberty to state what that plan was, he might say that the scheme was such as...
